

5. The Aftermath

Supermarket managers and pharmacists become the first civil libertarians: their shelves are clogged with Brecht, Vitalis, Brylcream, Head & Shoulders and the rest. Vending machines in gas stations' mens' rooms continue to dispense 2-for-a-quarter prophylactics (for the prevention of disease only) at a brisk pace but haven't moved a comb in weeks.
Perhaps we were too hasty, some are willing to suggest the barbers raise their prices back.
The town relents. It's May and warming up. The kids have itchy growing hair but still come home too late. The parents don't protest too much: they're digging in for another long hot summer.

-- William Matthews

Aurora, New York

Reply to an Academic Dean

Dear Mr. Pinsker,

Saw your poem in College English and I enjoyed it very much. Hope to see more of them soon.

Sincerely,
Kenneth O'Brien, Dean

So you'd like to see more of them soon...
But do you think words spill on paper like concrete And harden quickly into poetic canons?
(Good, I admit, for holding up administrations Or, in your case, blowing up a college reputation.)
Sitting safely on your deanship (Keeping up with the contributor's notes)
It must look easy to write more.
But, to be honest, it's more like blood
And every line that oozes out has its price.
(I wonder if you are willing to go yours?)
Perhaps we could both stand a transfusion -- Each, in his way, putting the essentials back in circulation.
Hope to see more of you soon.